Exhibition on Water Politics (2023-24)

On 9th March 2024, the first-year students of the course on Water Politics organized an insightful exhibition aimed at exploring the multifaceted dimensions of water politics. The exhibition served as a platform for students to showcase their understanding of the complex interplay between water, politics, and society, as well as to engage with peers and faculty members on critical issues surrounding water governance.

The exhibition featured a diverse range of exhibits, each offering unique perspectives on various aspects of water politics.

1. Historical Perspectives: Students explored how historical legacies continue to shape present-day water politics.
2. Regional Case Studies: Exhibits focused on regional case studies provided insights into the intricacies of water allocation, management, and conflicts.
3. Environmental Impacts: Several exhibits examined the environmental dimensions of water politics, highlighting issues such as pollution, ecosystem degradation, and the impact of climate change on water resources.
4. Social Justice and Equity: Students critically analyzed the social dimensions of water politics, addressing issues of access, equity, and marginalized communities' rights to water. They explored how power dynamics and socio-economic disparities intersect with water governance, influencing resource distribution and decision-making processes.
5. Policy Analysis: Exhibits featuring policy analyses examined the role of governments, international organizations, and stakeholders in shaping water governance frameworks. Students evaluated existing policies and proposed recommendations for more inclusive and effective water management strategies.

The exhibition on water politics by first-year students of the course exemplified their enthusiasm, dedication, and intellectual curiosity in exploring complex socio-political issues. Through their creative presentations and critical analyses, students demonstrated a deep understanding of the challenges and opportunities inherent in water governance. Their contributions not only underscore the importance of interdisciplinary approaches to understanding water politics but also inspire hope for informed and responsible water stewardship in the future.
